1. Write a paragraph of around 150 words to express your opinion on the following topic:

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income. I believe this because of two reasons. First of all, highly educated parents often focus on investing in their children's education, which partly creates their future success. They understand the importance of learning and can support their children better mentally. A survey among 700.000 families in Israel shows that children whose parents are educated usually get high scores. Secondly, the parents with high income can provide their children with a better environment to develop. For example, children who live in a family with stable finances are able to fulfill their dreams like studying abroad, learning special subjects. They have more opportunities to learn soft skills in a better environment. In conclusion, i strongly believe that children's achievements is highly influenced by the parents' education and income. All the reasons above clearly show that we should invest in our education to provide our children a high-quality condition to grow

1. Write a paragraph of around 150 words to express your opinion on the following topic:

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income. I believe this because of several reasons.

First off all, when the parents have a high level of education, they can make better choices and give better guidance for their children. This is true since they can also find and use many sources of information to help their children gain more knowledge. The most obvious example is that parents can help their children with lessons they didn't fully understand at school.

Secondly, when parents have a high income, they have enough money to provide better education. For example, they can choose schools like TH School or Vinschool, where children can both learn and play every day. Another important reason is that wealthy parents can invest in modern learning tools, such as computers or online courses, to help their children study more effectively. All the reasons above clearly show that children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income

1. Write a paragraph of around 150 words to express your opinion on the following topic:

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, the parents' education and income strongly influence their children's achievement. First of all, parents who hold advanced degrees want their children to receive a good education. They can consult with and help them choose goals and a suitable learning path. They also have the resources to find many kinds of learning resources to support their children's studies. Secondly, parental finances crucially affect their children's education. Because of having a high-paying job, they can afford to enable their children to learn more valuable skills such as playing musical instruments, developing presentation skills, and mastering problem-solving skills, as well as traveling to many places to broaden their knowledge. When they have enough money, their children have the opportunity to study in international schools and even study abroad without needing a scholarship. In conclusion, I strongly believe that children's achievement is highly impacted by the parents' education and income. All the reasons above clearly show that parents should strive to improve their knowledge and income to better support their children.

1. Write a paragraph of around 150 words to express your opinion on the following topic:

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, I believe that children's success is closely connected to their parents' education and income.

The first reason is that children's achievement is highly influenced by their parents' level of education. For instance, parents who are well educated often want their children to receive a good education like them, which helps the children gain more knowledge for life and achieve better results in the future.

The second reason is that parents with a good income can provide better opportunities for their children to succeed. For example, a higher income allows parents to give their children an easier life, help them learn what they want, and experience many interesting things that support their growth.

In conclusion, I strongly believe that children's achievements are greatly affected by their parents' education and income. All the reasons above clearly show that we should try our best to prepare a good life for our children from now on.

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by their parents' education and income. I believe this because of several reasons.

First of all, educated parents usually clearly understand the value of knowledge and the importance of learning, so they can be a companion who always guide and motivate the kids with better methods. This is true since they often help with homework, teach good study habits and encourage their children.

Secondly, parents with higher income can afford better learning conditions. For example, they can buy books, smart devices, and pay for online courses, which improve their children's performance and accessibility to knowledge.

Another important reason is that rich and educated parents often create a positive learning environment at home. To further explain, they stimulate curiosity and inspire their children's interests by many ways.

In conclusion, I strongly think that moneyed and good education background parents are the main factors in a child's success. All the reasons above clearly show that before thinking about having any child, we must prepare ourselves as best as possible conditions

Your Answer:

In my opinion, I agree that the parents' education and income highly influence Children's achievement. I believe this because of several reasons.

First of all, parents with a good education can provide better guidance for their children. This is true since they understand the importance of learning and can help their children in their studies. The most important thing when you raise children is companionship. With good education, you can accompany your children.

Secondly, the parents who have enough income can invest more in their children's education. They can send their children to an expensive school where children will have a good educational environment. They can also afford extra classes and extracurricular activities, and buy more good study equipment. Financial stability also reduces stress at home, so the children have more focus on their studies. They just have to study well without worrying about money problems.

In conclusion, I strongly think that the parents' education and income play a major role in children's achievement. All the reasons above clearly show that the parents are the foundation of their children.

Your Answer:

In my opinion, I strongly believe this is true for several reasons. First of all, parents' education can greatly support their children's learning and development. Educated parents can give proper guidance based on their own knowledge and experience, helping their children make suitable decisions about subjects, schools, or even career paths. In addition, parents with good education understand the importance of learning, which encourages their children to study harder. Secondly, parents' income also has a strong influence on children's success. For example, higher income allows better educational opportunities such as studying in quality schools or hiring private tutors. Besides, wealthy parents can invest in their children's interests and talents, helping them develop in all aspects. "Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, parents' educational and financial backgrounds strongly affect younger generations' success. I believe this because of several reasons.

First of all, if children's parents are highly educated, they know how to guide their children in the right direction. This is true since educated parents have up-to-date information about different aspects in life, they can offer valuable insights when their children make important decisions such as which major to follow or which school to enroll in, increasing the chance of success.

Secondly, wealthy parents can afford their child high-quality education. For example, instead of getting bachelor's degree from a public university, these children are sent to prestigious international universities, which allows them to learn from top experts in the field and gain hands-on experience. This advantage can help these children be more skilled and competent in the job market.

In conclusion, I strongly think that children's achievement depends on their parents' education and income. All the reasons above clearly show that prior generation should try their best to improve the conditions for the future generation.

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, children's achievement is not greatly influenced by their parents' education level and income. The first thing every child born will not choose their origin. The second thing is that a child's achievement will depend on their ability to absorb and perceive, and hard work and practice every day is the golden key to achieving success.

For example: You must regularly exercise every day to have a beautiful and healthy body.

Parents' education and income have only a small impact on children's achievements. Because children whose parents have low income and low education need to try harder.

In short, children's achievement will not depend too much on their parents' education level and income. They are two different issues and less dependent on each other.

Your Answer:

In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by the parent's education and income. I believe this because of several reasons.

First of all, higher income provides children with access to better educational environments. This is true since parents can afford necessary resources, such as courses, tutoring, or private schooling, that their children may need to excel. Secondly, children of financially stable parents are often more willing to take risks and learn from failure. For instance, if their child has an idea or needs resources for a project. Parents can easily provide. On the other hand, children from low-income families often lack self-confidence because they know that failure could put their family in a difficult situation.

Another important reason is that educated parents have the necessary knowledge and skills to support their children's learning. To further explain, when their children face a difficult math, these parents can often provide guidance or the strategy needed to figure out a solution.

In conclusion, I strongly think that children's achievement is highly influenced by the parent's education and income. All the reasons above clearly show that we should focus on career and money before deciding to have children.

In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income. I believe this because of several reasons. First of all, the parents who have a good education may hope their children also have it. This is true because almost all parents believe that having a large knowledge through study may lead to finding a good job. For example, parents in Vietnam really care about children's learning; they can spend an hour to find a good school, sign in for some private classes, and teach their child at home. Secondly, the children are also influenced by parents' income. The families that have a good economy can take care of their children's physical and mental well-being. In my opinion, children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income. I believe this because of several compelling reasons. First, when parents study well, they want their children to study even better. They teach their children to learn many new things and do what they could not do before. They also have high hopes and always support their children to do well at school. Secondly, when families have more money, they can spend it on their children's learning. For example, children can join extra classes such as drawing, piano, or learning languages. They can also travel to many places and learn about different cultures. This helps them see new things and know more about the world. To conclude, I think children learn better when their parents are educated and have enough money. In my opinion, the parents' education and income have a strong influence on children's achievement in the future. The first reason is that parents who have solid foundation and higher education level, always have higher expectations for their children. That in turn affects the child's own motivation and achievement. A recent study shows that these kinds of parents will have positive psychological effects on their children, make them put in more effort and develop stronger learning behaviors to meet their parents' expectations. Secondly, the more income the parents have, the more likely their children are to have better outcomes in life. For example, wealthier parents can invest more in their children's development through factors like better schools, more learning resources, financial support and other benefits. First of all, children's prospects of success are highly affected by their parents' education. This is true since a child who is raised with good parenting tends to behave better and study harder than one without proper upbringing methods. It is obvious that a well-educated and diligent person will stand a high chance of professional promotion. Secondly, the salary of parents plays an important part in their children's academic results. To further explain, a wealthy family always opts for the best educational environment for their children despite high fees, which is a solid foundation for their future success. In contrast, children born into poor families may not receive quality education or may even abruptly leave school due to their family's financial difficulties, which will probably cause obstacles to their development. First of all, I believe that people who have good education have enough knowledge in order to raise children. It is proved in a research that the rate of abused children with high-educated parents is lower than in other families. Secondly, family's income might strongly affect children's opportunities to access education, healthcare and entertainment. For instance, children from families with financial difficultly might not pay their tuition fee if they don't have any scholarships. In addition, if poor families face with health problems, they have to work most of the time to work and can not pay attention to their children; therefore, the children might be distracted from studying. "Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, the level of a child's educational and professional success is undeniably and significantly shaped by their parents' educational background and economic standing. This influence is evident in how parental education often correlates with the value placed on academics at home and the ability of parents to directly assist with complex homework and navigate the school system effectively. Furthermore, higher family income directly translates to critical resources like quality childcare, access to better-resourced schools, and funding for extracurricular activities and private tutoring, all of which enhance a child's competitive edge. While some argue that individual motivation and a child's natural intelligence are the primary determinants of success, it is difficult to ignore the profound structural advantages provided by wealth and high parental education that make the path to achievement much smoother. Therefore, while personal drive certainly plays a role, a parent's socioeconomic status functions as a powerful, fundamental predictor of a child's future academic and professional achievement.

First of all, if the parents have education, they also want their children to have a good education. This is true since research shows that 70% of students coming from different universities have a father or mother who graduated from high school or have at least one bachelor's degree. Additionally, they can give their children a good direction for the future. For instance, the parents have clear plans for their children in each important period of life, so they are easily excellent. Secondly, parents who have high income usually give their sons or daughters good conditions to learn as well as develop. For example, the high-earning parents are willing to buy a lot of nutritious or delicious food for their family to use daily. Moreover, they can send their babies to international schools. Furthermore, the children have a good condition to learn more soft skills they want, such as communication skills, English, or dancing, which are good for children's success. In conclusion, I strongly think that children's lives are affected by their parents' knowledge and income. All the reasons above clearly show that the parents should continue and try their best to have continuous learning, work hard, and develop themselves to earn a lot of money.

1. Write a paragraph of around 150 words to express your opinion on the following topic:

"Children's achievement is highly influenced by the parents' education and income."

Your Answer:

In my opinion, parents' education and income have influence on their children's achievement. I believe this because of several reasons. First of all, if parents are well-educated, their children have a better chance to access quality education. This is true since parents can guide their children on how to study effectively and choose a good environment for their development. Secondly, parents with stable financial resources can provide more opportunities for their children. For example, they can pay for extracurricular activities such as dance, singing, art, or piano lessons to help children develop their talents . In addition, they can send their children to well-equipped schools and take them on educational trips, which help them learn more and develop fully. In conclusion, I strongly believe that parents' education and income influence their children's achievement. All the season above clearly show that we should study hard and work to earn enough so that our children have the best conditions for learning.
